I'm Doug, thank you for being here!

People rarely call a therapist when things are calm. They call when the same argument has been running for months, or after something happened that can't be walked back, or when the pressure around sex, money, or trust has built with no clear way out. By then, understanding the problem isn't the hard part. Acting on it is.

Most of my work is grounded in cognitive behavioral therapy, shaped by two modalities. The first is Choice Theory, which holds that people choose far more of what happens in their lives than they tend to believe. I trained directly with Dr. William Glasser, who developed it, and I'm still involved with the Glasser Institute. The second is Polarity Management, a way of working with couples who have landed on opposite sides of a question that may not have a clean answer. I also draw on Adlerian therapy, family systems work, and Gottman Level 3 training.

	My clients tend to be high-functioning people whose relationships are under strain. The work is structured. I assess what's driving the pattern, name it, and help build a plan. Clients tell me I'm on point rather than laid back. Sessions run longer when the situation calls for it.

[IMAGE]	Meet Doug Lormand I'm Doug Lormand, an LPC and AASECT-certified sex therapist. I've spent twenty years helping individuals and couples work through sex, infidelity, and money. Before private practice, I worked in some of the harder corners of mental health care: acute care psychiatric facilities, inpatient dual diagnosis rehabilitation, intensive outpatient programs, adult mental health services, and community-based settings along the US-Mexico border, where I made home visits across the border region. That range shapes how I practice now. I have seen what happens when a problem is left to sit, and I do not think a relationship in trouble should wait eight weeks for a first appointment.

	My graduate work includes a Master of Education in Counseling and a Master of Science in Human Resource Development, with post-graduate training from Columbia University. I'm an active member of AASECT, the American Counseling Association, and the American Mental Health Counselors Association, and I'm approved to supervise other counselors in Texas. I'm licensed in Texas, Colorado, and Louisiana, and I see clients online across all three. I was raised in Louisiana, and the deep South is still where I go when I can. Outside the practice I'm usually outdoors, in the gym, cooking, or with my grandson.

How Doug Works

[icon] Direct & Warm	Do Something About It Insight is a start, not the finish. Doug pushes toward change you can act on, on your timeline, not a therapist's schedule.	No Pretense Southern, straight-talking, and honest without being harsh. Therapy works better
---	--	---

Doug names patterns directly and says what he sees. No months of vague reflection. The point is clarity you can use.		when the room feels like real life, not a performance.
