[H2] What is Sex Therapy?

Option A

Sex therapy is talk-based therapy that helps individuals and couples understand how desire, arousal, intimacy, and self-image fit together and where the disconnect is. There is no physical exam and no contact; the work happens entirely through conversation. Because sexual concerns usually sit at the intersection of the body, the relationship, and a person's own history, the work looks at all three rather than the symptom alone.

Most people arrive having never been taught how their sexuality works, only what it was supposed to look like. A lot of the early work is simply naming things clearly so they stop feeling so personal.

Doug Lormand, LPC, is an AASECT-certified sex therapist serving adults across Texas, Colorado, and Louisiana.

[H2] Does this resonate with you? Or (Does this sound like you?)

Sex is never just about sex. When it stops working, it leaks into everything. Some of this might land:

- You want to want it. Your body did not get the memo.
- You and your partner stopped being on the same page a long time ago.
- You think about it constantly and talk about it almost never
- You have never felt free to explore your sexuality.
- You can be right there in the room and feel completely gone.
- You carry shame about what you want, or do not want.

- You are starting to think you never really understood your own sexuality.

[H2] Sexual Concerns I Help With

- Low or absent desire.
- Mismatched desire between partners.
- Arousal and performance worries.
- Difficulty reaching orgasm.
- Pain or anxiety around intimacy.
- Shame about sexual history, fantasies, or identity.
- Sexual self-discovery, often in midlife.

[H2] How We Work Together

We start with a clear picture of what is happening and what you want to be different. No judgment. No rushing.

From there, the work is practical. We look at the patterns, sort out what is physical from what is emotional or relational, and build understanding you can put to use at a pace you set.

If a partner is involved, both of you have a place in the room. If a medical issue may be in play, I will say so and help you find the right support.

We're a good fit if:

[H2] Sex Therapy FAQs

Is sex therapy the same as anything physical?

No. Sex therapy is talk therapy. There is no physical exam and no physical contact. Everything happens through conversation, online.

Do you work with individuals or only couples?

Both. Plenty of people come on their own to understand their sexuality, and plenty come as couples. Either works.

How soon can I get in?

Quickly, by design. Doug keeps room in his schedule for people who need to talk now, not in seven weeks. Reach out today, and you can usually be on the schedule within 24 hours, often the same day.

Do I have to be an existing client?

No. New and existing clients both use this. If this is your first time, you complete a short set of intake forms online before the first session, and then you talk.

Can we do this online?

Yes. Sessions are online across Texas, Colorado, and Louisiana, so you can meet from somewhere private and comfortable. You do need to be located in one of those three states.

How much does it cost, and do you take insurance?

Doug offers private-pay sessions and select insurance through Headway and can provide documentation for out-of-network reimbursement when it applies. The specifics are confirmed when you reach out.

What if I have never talked about this with anyone?

That is the most common starting point, not the exception. You do not need the right words or a tidy explanation. Discussing it in the first conversation is enough.

More FAQ from Doug:

Do highly intelligent, successful people struggle more in relationships?

Success in business, academics, and careers does not automatically translate into relationship success. Many high-achieving people excel because they are logical, independent, disciplined, and results-oriented. Relationships often require a different skill set: emotional awareness, vulnerability, empathy, flexibility, and the ability to tolerate uncertainty. Some people spend years developing their professional lives while unintentionally neglecting the emotional skills necessary to build and maintain a deeply connected relationship. Therapy can help identify these blind spots and create healthier patterns of connection.

What is the root cause of couples continue having the same argument over and over?

Most recurring arguments are not actually about the surface issue. Whether the topic is money, sex, parenting, household responsibilities, or communication, the deeper issue is often about unmet emotional needs, trust, respect, security, appreciation, or feeling understood. Couples frequently become trapped in predictable cycles where both partners defend themselves instead of seeking to understand one another. Therapy helps uncover the deeper meaning beneath the conflict and teaches couples how to break these repetitive patterns.

Can love survive betrayal?

In many cases, yes. Betrayal can severely damage trust, but it does not automatically mean a relationship is over. Recovery requires honesty, accountability, transparency, and a willingness from both partners to understand what happened and why. Rebuilding trust is rarely quick or easy, but many couples emerge from the process with a stronger understanding of themselves and each other. The goal is not simply to move past the betrayal but to create a healthier relationship than the one that existed before it occurred.

Can emotional connection disappear even when two people still love each other?

Love and emotional connection are not always the same thing. Many couples continue to love each other while becoming disconnected through stress, busy schedules, parenting demands, unresolved conflicts, resentment, or years of taking one another for granted. Emotional connection requires intentional effort, curiosity, communication, and shared experiences. When couples stop investing in these areas, distance often develops despite genuine love remaining present.

How do sex, money, power, and expectations affect a relationship?

These four areas influence nearly every intimate relationship. Money affects security, decision-making, and lifestyle choices. Power influences who makes decisions, whose needs are prioritized, and how conflict is managed. Expectations often determine whether partners feel fulfilled or disappointed. Sex reflects both physical intimacy and emotional connection. When couples struggle in one or more of these areas, conflict often spreads into other parts of the relationship. Understanding how these forces interact can help couples create healthier agreements and stronger partnerships.

Why do people keep choosing the wrong partners?

Many people unknowingly repeat familiar relationship patterns. Sometimes individuals are drawn to partners who feel emotionally familiar because they resemble early family dynamics or past relationships. Others allow loneliness, chemistry, attraction, or fear of being alone to outweigh compatibility and shared values. Healthy partner selection requires more than attraction. It involves evaluating character, emotional availability, life goals, communication styles, and long-term compatibility. Therapy can help individuals identify patterns that may be leading them toward relationships that do not serve their long-term well-being.

Can intimacy be rebuilt after years of distance?

Yes. While rebuilding intimacy requires effort, many couples successfully reconnect after years of emotional or physical distance. The process begins by understanding what created the distance in the first place. Intimacy is often restored through honest conversations, increased emotional safety, improved communication, and a renewed commitment to understanding each other's needs. Small, consistent changes frequently create significant improvements over time.

What's the difference between being in a relationship and having a satisfying relationship?

Being in a relationship simply means two people are connected by commitment, marriage, partnership, or shared responsibilities. A satisfying relationship goes much deeper. It involves trust, emotional safety, mutual respect, healthy communication, affection, intimacy, shared purpose, and the ability to navigate life's challenges together. Many people stay in relationships for years without feeling truly connected. A satisfying relationship is one where both partners feel seen, valued, understood, and supported as they continue to grow individually and together.
